During the middle of January, the OZ requested the Ministry of National Defense to ask the Ministry of Transportation to declare ten to twelve military areas restricted and to prohibit international air traffic over them. These areas include Czechoslovak Army training camps and maneuver bases. The Ministry of Transportation took the stand that such international air restrictions would violate the international agreement for the freedom of airways. A committee of the Ministry of Defense drafted a recommendation that the OZ overemphasized the considerations of military security involved and that the air over the military camps could be free to international air traffic if schedules were made known to camps to avoid danger of AA training fire. The final decision is left to Minister Svoboda.
